Multipage Fixture

The first page of the combined fixture holds plain prose. Its planted sentence is: “The violet ferry carried nineteen patient cartographers across the silver estuary.” That sentence appears on this page and nowhere else.

The rest of the page describes the imaginary voyage. The cartographers drew the coastline twice, once at low tide and once at high tide, and argued about which drawing should go into the final atlas. They settled the matter by drawing a third map that showed both tides at once.

The second page is set in two columns. Its method paragraph relies on natural-language summaries of each imaginary voyage, written by the cartographers themselves after they returned to port.

The summaries were short, rarely more than a paragraph, and each one named the weather, the tide and the number of gulls seen from the deck.

The right column notes that the summaries disagreed about the gulls more than about anything else. The planted phrase for this column is: “the harbour pilot counted gulls in threes and rounded every total down.”

	Low tide	High tide
Gulls	14	−3
	(2.1)	(0.8)
Boats	27	31
	(4.4)	(5.0)

Table 1: Invented counts from the imaginary voyage

The table above is invented and exists only to exercise the table flag.

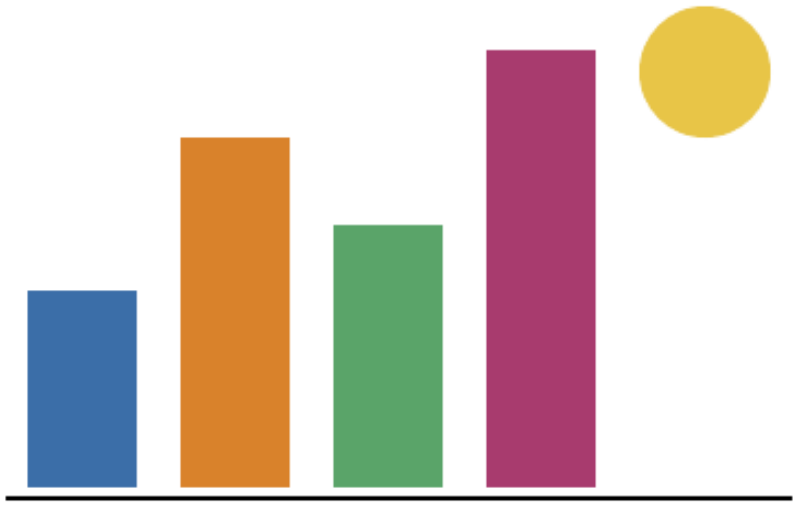

Figure 1: Invented bar heights from the imaginary voyage

SYNTHETIC SCAN PAGE

LANTERN 4821

OTTER 3907

MEADOW 1265

The quiet harbour kept 58 copper boats.